Excerpt: . assisted in its progress by all the impetuosity of the heart, which proceeds in the same direction as itself. Will it on this account be less philosophical? There are people who pretend it will. But to persuade us of this, it would be necessary to prove, that the order of the words ought to be different in philosophy and in eloquence; that it is better, and more perspicuous in itself, to say, in a philosophical treatise, Sol eft rotundus, than rotundus eft sol; in fine, that the Latin language, which performs the greater, in bending itself to the progress of the passions, shall not be able to perform the less, by simply following that of the understanding. II. Of the French Arrangement. If it be more than probable that the Latins and Grecians followed the natural order, there is the fame degree of probability, that, on our part, we invert it; since we follow an order contrary to theirs, and put at the end what they put at the beginning. But whence comes this disorder among us? The question here is, to inquire into the causes of it, and to unfold them as clearly as possible. The Latins had but one reason to invert the natural order, of which we have spoken; this was the harmony. Their language, more flexible than ours, assumed all the forms of their ideas, and represented them without any change, almost as in a mirror. As they had...
