Some of the most enthusiastic advocates of the procedure--Boeckel, Rydygier, and others--proposed, indeed, to operate upon children as well as adults. They thought to recognize two forms of club-foot, a tendinous and an osseous one. The former, they asserted, was curable by the ordinary methods of manipulation, tenotomy, and the like. But for the correction of the latter osteotomy was necessary. In spite of these views held by an enthusiastic minority, the ruling opinion of continental surgery seems to be that while we have in tarsotomy an operation of undoubted value, its general adoption in the treatment of club-foot, to the exclusion of more conservative and milder measures, especially in the case of children, would mean retrogression rather than advancement. THE NEW BANTINGISM. A Little green-covered book, entitled Corpulence and its Treatment on Physiological Principles, is being, extensively distributed among the news-stands of this and other cities. It is written by Dr. William Ebstein, and translated and adapted for popular reading by an ingenuous and philanthropic physician of this city. It is always a matter of much delicacy if not danger to lay before the public a new curative method. For one must be sure the method is right, sure the public will understand it, and confident that if tried by the laity it will do no harm, since, of those sufferers that read, not two per cent, go to their physicians, nor one per cent, to the translator. Dr....
