Not illustrated. 1894 Excerpt: .the same inversion of the cane-sugar has been observed to take place. Certain grains again when cultivated in weak starch-paste have been shown to liquify it, with formation of maltose. The research which forms the subject of the present paper was directed first to the preparation and identification of digestive enzymes from pollen, and to the variations in their amount which attended the progress of the pollen-tube through the tissue of the style. Both diastase and invertase were found to exist in various pollens; some containing both, some only one of the two. To extract them the pollen was collected from dehiscing stamens, bruised in an agate mortar, and extracted with various solvents, usually 5 per cent, of NaCl. As an antiseptic during the digestions, -2 per cent. KCy was found most serviceable. 1 Abstract of a paper read before the Koyal Society, February 8,...
